

Hello! This is my (Duncan's) portfolio for applying to LungA School.

Below is some recent work I've made (digital & analog photography, writing, pen drawings, and websites).

There's more work on my website, https://duncanpetrie.com.

840

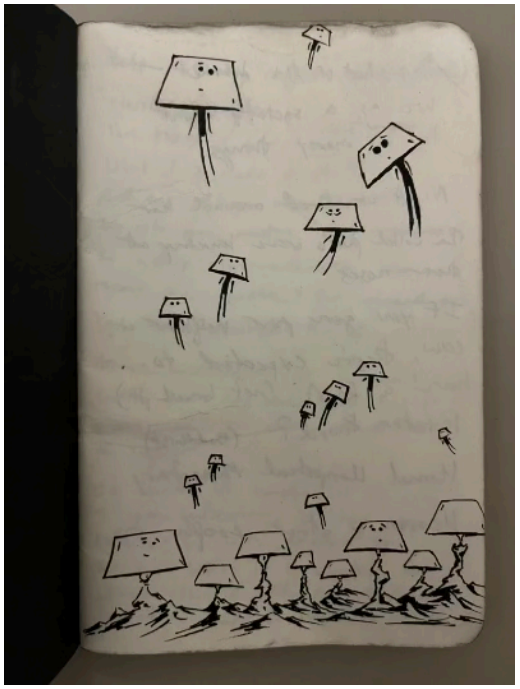

This is the beginning of my most recent short story, Pedigree (available here).

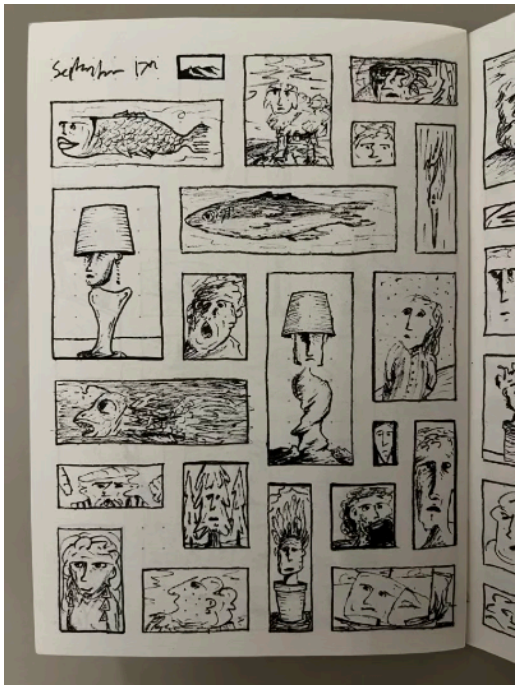

Johnny was always a bad husband, but I didn't know it at first. I'd never hung off someone's arm like that. Strangers gave me flowers, and I had to wear sunglasses indoors, because the paparazzi flashes gave me headaches. Johnny was a delicate thing, like a piece of jewelry. He won all sorts of prizes. We'd go to the dog shows together, Crufts, and Westminster, and Worlds, and I'd walk out on his arm, smiling, squinting at the cameras. It felt like it would never end.

But it did. I gave birth to quintuplets, and suddenly I couldn't travel. Johnny spent his days at the shows, on red carpets and private jets, and I spent my days at home. I resigned myself to an inward life, to long, lonely afternoons, leaving only to buy groceries and to take the kids for walks.

Johnny was a show dog who didn't think about anything that wasn't right in front of him. Botox couldn't fix that. I stayed home with the kids, and he spent his nights on the road, always in some other girl's crate. When he returned, before he opened the front door, he'd roll around in the grass, trying to get her smell out of his fur. But he was my husband, and I was a dog. Of course I knew.

Spring, 2007. I'd just turned six, which in dog years is long past young. Johnny was traveling, and the kids were at doggy daycare.

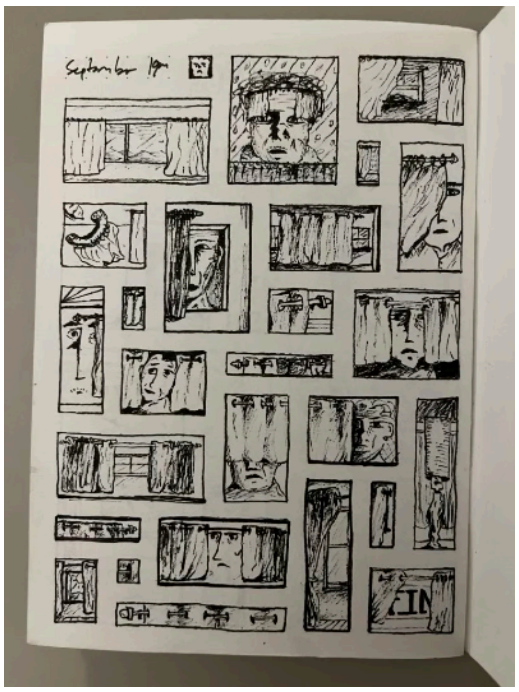

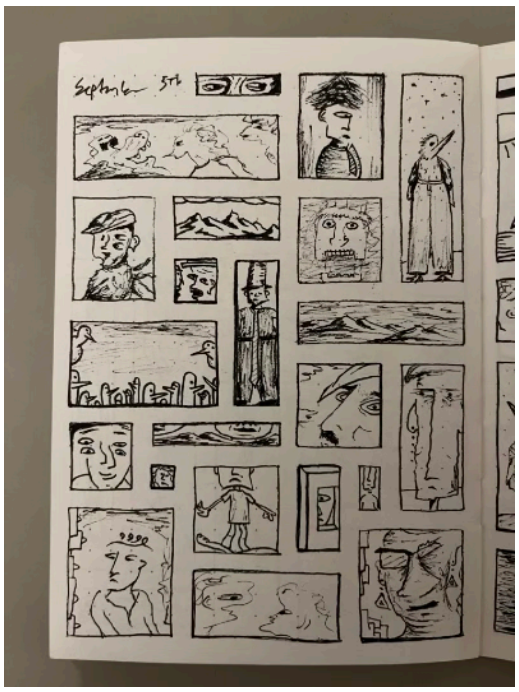

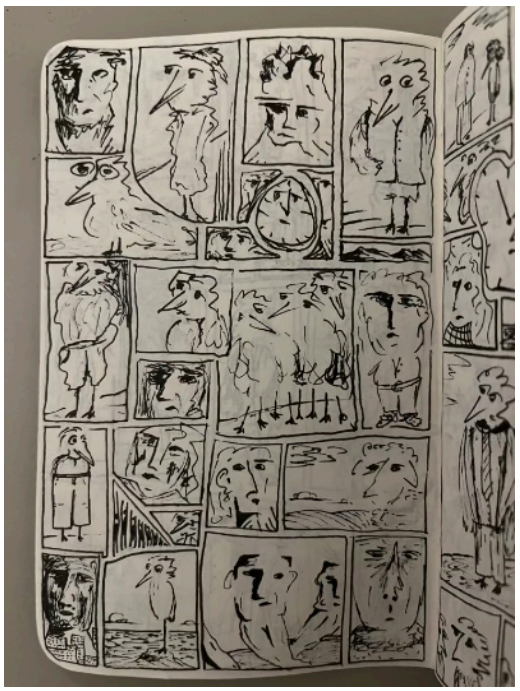

Here are some pages from my sketchbooks.

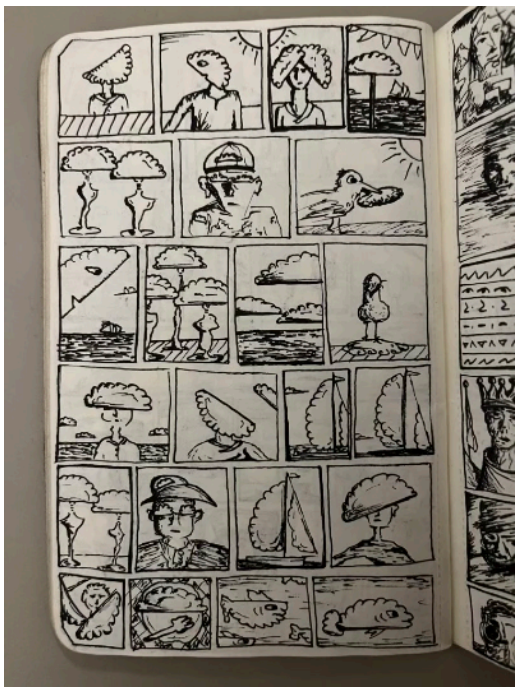

I'm still unsure where this is going, but I'm experimenting!

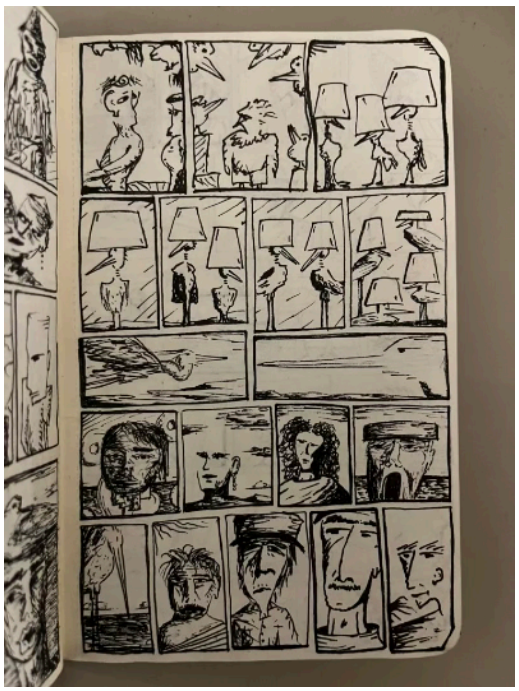

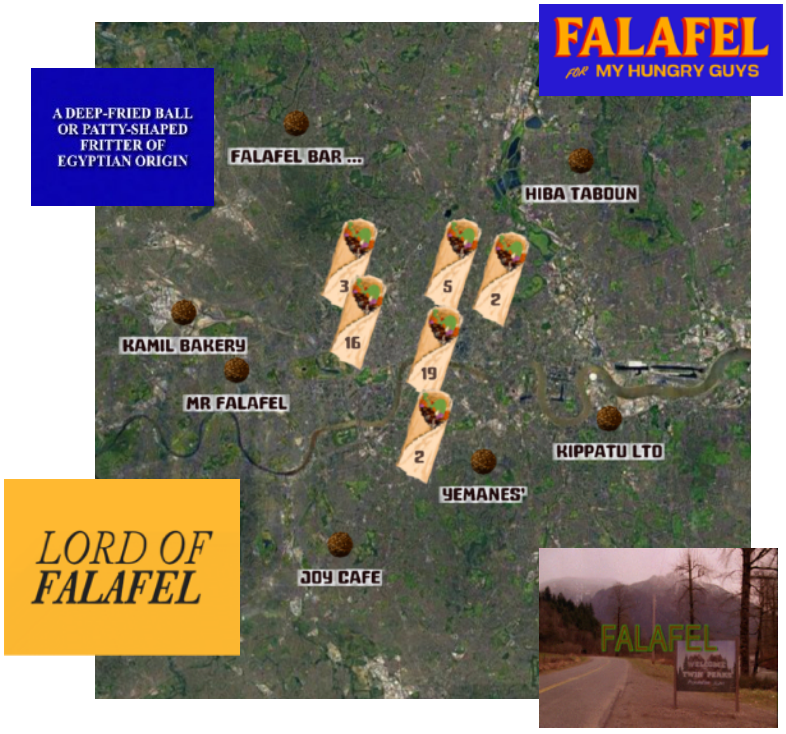

To Pigeon-Fill the Sky

Narrative photobook — see the web version:
https://pigeons.duncanpetrie.com

https://falafel.fyi

microblog - artwork, code, essay